A: I have resolved the problem by installing the driver from my graphics card manufacturer's website. I downloaded the latest and greatest video driver for my graphics card, and replaced the existing one with it. Thanks for taking the time to read my long question! Q: Possible array_map problem $val1 = 5; $val2 = 7; $val3 = 9; $arr1 = array($val1, $val2, $val3); array_map(function($val) { $val = intval($val); return $val; }, $arr1); echo "; print_r($arr1); expected result : array($val1, $val2, $val3) but I got : array($val1, 7, 9) I want array_map to return me the same result as the 'expected' array... Why is this happening? It is happening because you are overriding each element of $arr1. Try it this way. return intval($val); 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a two-cycle engine. 2. Description of Related Art A two-cycle engine may be a single cylinder engine having a piston, a cylinder, and a piston rod. In a combustion chamber defined by a cylinder head and a cylinder liner, fuel is injected into the combustion chamber and is combusted. The combusted gas is compressed and is then exploded by a combustion piston moving downward in a cylinder bore of the cylinder. The combustion force of the combustion piston drives the piston rod, causing the piston to move upward. An air-fuel mixture in the combustion chamber is combusted with this reciprocating movement of the piston rod. It is known that at the time of the combustion in the two-cycle engine, the compression of the combusted gas in the combustion chamber is achieved as a result of the reciprocating movement of the piston rod, that is, as a result of a downward movement of the piston rod and an upward movement of the piston. A portion of the force required for the upward movement of the piston is discharged as a result of the combustion. The single cylinder
